The incident happened outside the Hoddesdon leisure centre at about 8.30pm, where Muslim community members were holding a vigil for 'insensitive' street preachers. A large crowd had gathered, some with placards, who attempted to force the group of preachers off the pavement.

According to The Independent, an on-duty policeman from Hoddesdon was manning the water cannon but failed to use it. There was reportedly more trouble afterwards when the crowd attempted to remove the preachers from the site. The demonstrators had been trying to drum up support for a petition they had set up on Change.org in a bid to stop pro-Brexit street preachers they felt were being "unrepresentative." A spokesman for the Hoddesdon New Road police station told The Independent that the officer had not been disciplined. He added that a report has been submitted to the Chief Constable and that while the incident was not premeditated, the man was "pushed around and intimidated" by some of the demonstrators. Hoddesdon is a small suburb of north-west London, home to some 600,000 people. The majority of the district's residents voted for Leave in the 2016 referendum. Meanwhile, earlier this week we reported on the clash between Brexiters and police at the British embassy in Tehran, where dozens of people were injured in the ensuing riot. Brexiteers had tried to force their way in after reading a petition circulated by a group they believe is backed by a pro-EU official at the embassy. The present invention relates to an outboard
